

Embracing our Differences to Build a Connected Community

Let's build a community together. Communities are usually filled with people from all sorts of different cultures, races and celebrations. Everyone had their part. If someone drops their trash, another picks it up. Communities should have some sort of vibe that provides a base for them to start growing. I don't think that you should live in a neighborhood without even knowing who lives up the block. Or in an apartment building and not knowing who might be petting their dog right next to you, just a wall separating them. I believe that communities should be interactive, connected and happy. Full of good vibes and responsibilities.

But what if a person suddenly changes, they start being mean, and excluding people, only choosing particular people. They go around dropping trash and never do anything about the community? To avoid something like that, we need more than a motto or catchphrase. We need core values. Core Values are values that the whole community is based on and stands off. They should be strong and uplifting like kindness or courage. I think that 4 would be a good start. But you might ask, so, people can still change, be mean right? I don't think that somebody would want to break a chain of flowing goodness and greatness of a community but if they do, then there are people who will take care of that.

All of our differences make us unique. We all have a different story. Some are cheerful, sometimes people are grumpy, but they are people and we should treat them like some. Even better, you are embracing them. You could start by positive interaction. That way, you could understand them better, and help have a more peaceful atmosphere towards them. They could trust you. Sometimes there are rumors about other people and their differences. You shouldn't believe them if you don't have evidence. And besides you need a more connected community to get a better city. In simpler words, you need good people to get a good community and with lots of connected people. With a connected city, we can inspire others and make our world a better place. It could all start (it actually already is) with you and your community. You could make a big difference. You could change the world.
